
 Via RSS Reader

 Via Email

Search

POPULAR POSTS

- A clear picture of the industry's past 15 months
- The essentials of women's apparel
- Building a Web site that gets results
- Your Web/E-commerce questions answered

PAGES

- Home
- About
- Authors
- Subscribe

DELIVERED TO YOUR DESKTOP. OR LAPTOP.
OR MOBILE DEVICE. OR NETBOOK*

By FRAN O'HAGAN - PRESIDENT, PIED PIPER MANAGEMENT CO.

APRIL 28TH, 2010

Print This Post

Email This Post

Answering the brochure debate

Motorcycle prospects walk into a dealership interested in buying a new motorcycle, but the facts say that half the time those prospects will walk back out the door holding nothing in their hands. No keys to a new bike, but also no brochure.

Why the reluctance to provide a brochure or other selling materials to prospects? Some dealerships argue it's too expensive to hand out so many brochures, and others argue that the quickest way to send a prospect out the door without buying is to give them a brochure.

One of the most respected men of the advertising industry, David Ogilvy, famously said, "long copy sells." His point was if a prospect was willing to keep learning about a product, the seller should keep providing material to teach. The moment the seller stops providing new material, the seller has stopped selling.

Considering that 80 percent of your dealership's "ups" walk back out the door without buying, wouldn't you rather leave them with "long copy" in the form of a brochure to keep selling to them after they walk out the door?

No, your salespeople don't have to give them a brochure immediately during the visit, but make sure they are handed one as they are headed out the door. Or even better, give your prospects not only a brochure, but also something to sell your dealership too: a copy of a newspaper article or even a pamphlet you've created about what makes your dealership unique.

